Mercy Café

Kate Asche

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.csbsju.edu/studio_one

Part of the Arts and Humanities Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.csbsju.edu/studio_one/vol37/iss1/19

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@CSB/SJU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Studio One by an authorized editor of DigitalCommons@CSB/SJU. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@csbsju.edu.
Mercy Café

In the Mercy Café, it’s all hair nets and white shoes. The staff look like the nurses except for their tools: spatulas, ladles and spoons.

There are few windows in the Mercy Café. The light is dominantly fluorescent, blue. The staff and food take on a sickly hue beneath the artificial afternoon.

In the Mercy Café, all the food is “healthy:” low sugar, low fat, high fiber, low salt. It is too bland to distract you from your greatest fears.

Everyone is quiet in the Mercy Café: people looking past each other, past poorly hidden griefs. Except for the staff: they are boisterous.

They compliment you or comment on the weather as they slap something vaguely vegetal on your plate.

“Sister,” the say to each other. “Bless you,” they say to us. In the Mercy Café, you eat what you came for, what you’ve paid for, what you’ve been given. It is not delicious, and it is not beautiful. But it will fill you up.

Kate Asche
Rancho Cordova, California