2018

Elegy for Stan

Chet Corey

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.csbsju.edu/studio_one

Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://digitalcommons.csbsju.edu/studio_one/vol43/iss1/21
Elegy for Stan

1
Your eyes, for that moment
when with effort you lifted your head
from the pocket of sweat it had made in pillow
and turned them toward my bent
down face,
your eyes were the eyes of a bull
who cocks its horns
at the cape of a matador,
as if it knows it is merely a man
in an elaborate costume
who invites and waits and turns.

2
They were the eyes
of our father, perhaps in anger,
drunkenness or in fear--all of which were the same, though not.

His brown eyes yours,
and so I saw him one more time.
3
Fear I think in his and yours
before you’d charged the red cape.

Or more of a questioning: Why?
And I bent to your ear

and whispered you’d been a good brother and I loved you.

4
Did I say I forgive you? I think I did before I’d said the rest.

It was the more important, though you may not have understood what for. But I did then, as do I now and I recall it all again.

5
Death was a matador
in morphine induced tights and vest

and pillbox-like hat from the Forties who invites, waits and turns.

Bewildered--wild-eyed, you charged the tousled cape bravely.

You gored the matador.

-Chet Corey
Bloomington, MN